DIRECTION: Read the given passage carefully and attempt the questions that follow:

He was a deeply subtle man, I know by now. With such natures it is usually a waste of efforts to fence. The only way to speak face-to-face is to be direct. I said that I had been waiting for news of the Nobel Prize, and that I was very sorry. He started at me, and nodded he didn't pretend not to mind. He said something to the effect that it would be good to have. Then, quite suddenly, he gave a grim chuckle, and launched into an anecdote, possibly apocryphal and certainly slanderous, about another unsuccessful candidate- not English-speaking who had been bucking for the prize for years and years. He had left nothing to chance. He had known all the rights boys (in frosts demonology, this probably meant some of the enemies) he had been told that it was in the bag. The day of the election, he was sitting with a horde of supporters. He had the champagne out on the table. He was waiting for the telephone to ring. There was a long wait. A longer wait. At last the telephone did ring. He hadn't got it. He was told the name of the winner. It is impossible, he cried. It is impossible. It is impossible. That was Ali he could think of, frost said, cheering himself up with malice. But had happened

After that, he was quite gay. He talked about England. He was sensitive to his audience. So that I was left under the impression that he had been a lifelong anglophile. When I read his letters and his remarks about the British (a term he wouldn't have used to me) I wasn't surprised about something but I was by those. May be, as I have suggested, he had some to think better of us. He was enthusiastic about the common language- that was essential thing. Then he spoke about what he called 'the locative' in art. Art who meant anything to him was locative, rooted in a place, in the singularities of a place. We had a bit of an argument. Temperamentally, I said, I was on his side. But locative arts needs knowledge and patience to understand that was why cosmopolitan art, abstract art, traveled further and faster. One didn't have to know anything to read, say, kafka or Hemingway. They had traveled round the world to an extent that Jane Austen or forester never would) Frost wouldn't have it. The greatest locative art transcended everything. It was organic, and no other art could be. He still has immense stamina for argument, or rather for his oblique interpretation of ideas. He would have gone on talking long after our hosts returned.
